Continued. Perhaps you'd like to find out where past employees of your company are now working, to give you a sense of future employers for yourself. To do this, type in your company name and, in the box that will appear below it, choose one of the drop-down options "Current OR Past; Current; Past; Past Not Current" that meets your needs.

Then you can use the Location feature (6, 7) to focus your search in your own city or region or expand it nationally. Especially for local searches, it can be helpful to limit your search to only include results a certain distance from a zip code (8).

Last, searching by schools you've attended (5) can get you connected to alumni, who can be powerful allies in your job search.

You can always search by any key words (1) that make sense. Recruiters will often use this tool to find candidates. If you were a recruiter, what words would you use to find a candidate like you?

You can search for a specific person by using the first or last name fields. I have used this method when I meet someone at a networking event and can only remember her first name. During our conversation, "Brenda" (2) told me she lived in Carmel Indiana, and I know that zip code is 46032 or 46033 (7). This can reduce my search results considerably. If I can review photos, I can find her pretty easily.

If you know the kind of title you'd like to have in a new job, you can search by job title (3) to find potential sources for informational interviews.

Searching by Company (4) can be a powerful source of information. Research people you know who already work at a company you are targeting. You'll also see which of your connections have a connection to someone at the company. You can reach out and ask for introductions. Continue.
